were to her body in the water though there was nothing on the body. She was round, all those weeks after the accident, her skull's face close to my arm. She was looking at me, her eyes searching mine. "The rock," she whispered, "her beautiful face unrecognizable and both arms broken. The Winter identified her. He went up to Edgemoor to do it. He was alone. He was very ill at the time but he would do it. No one could

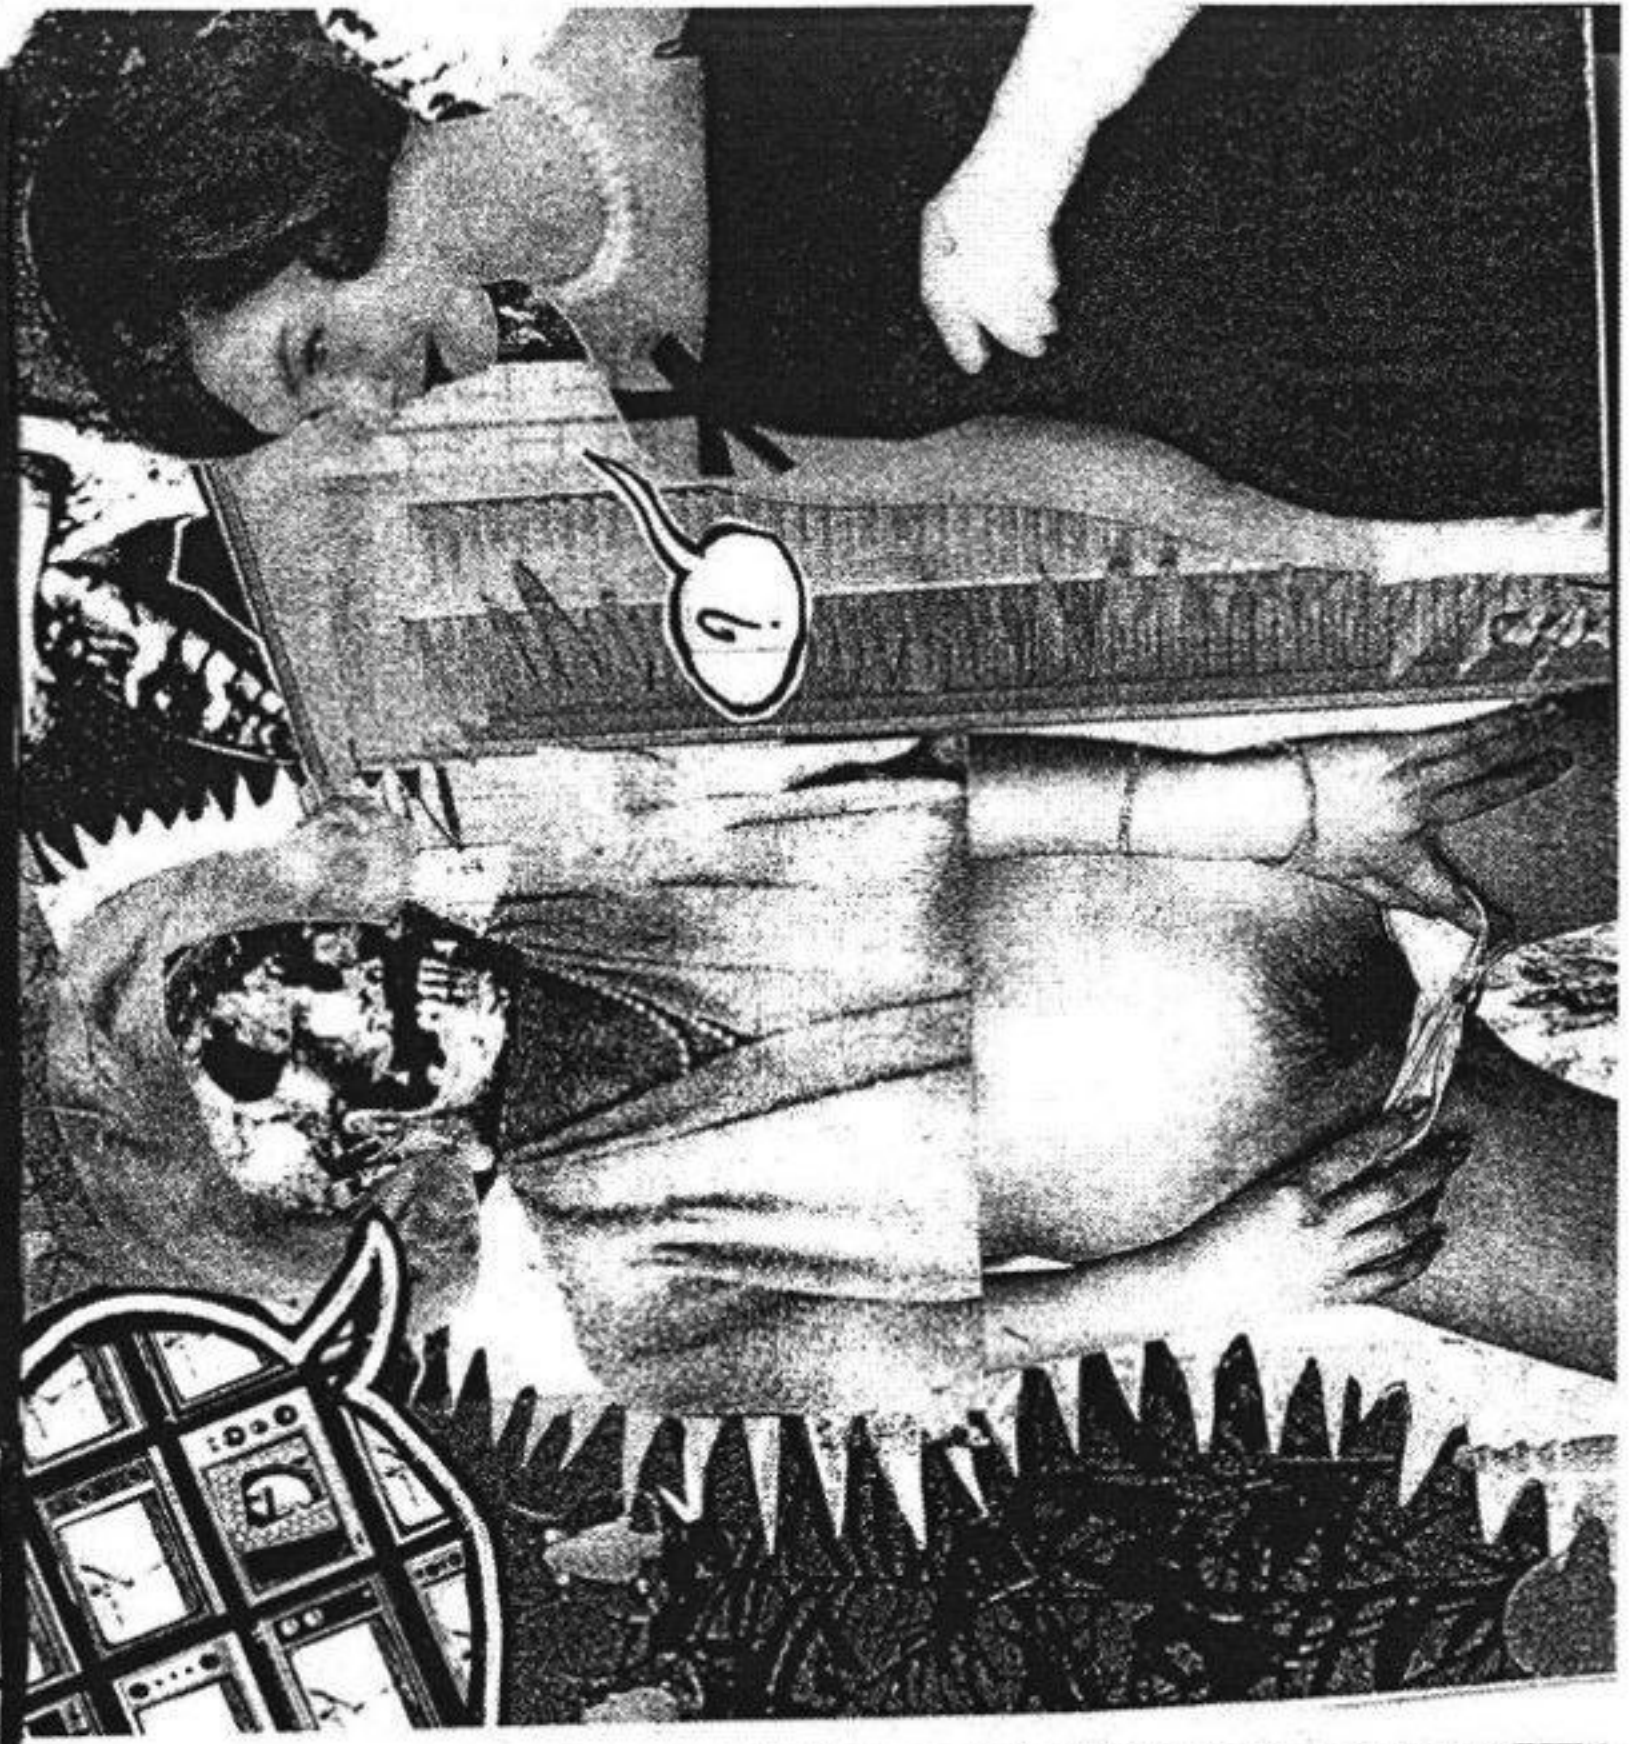

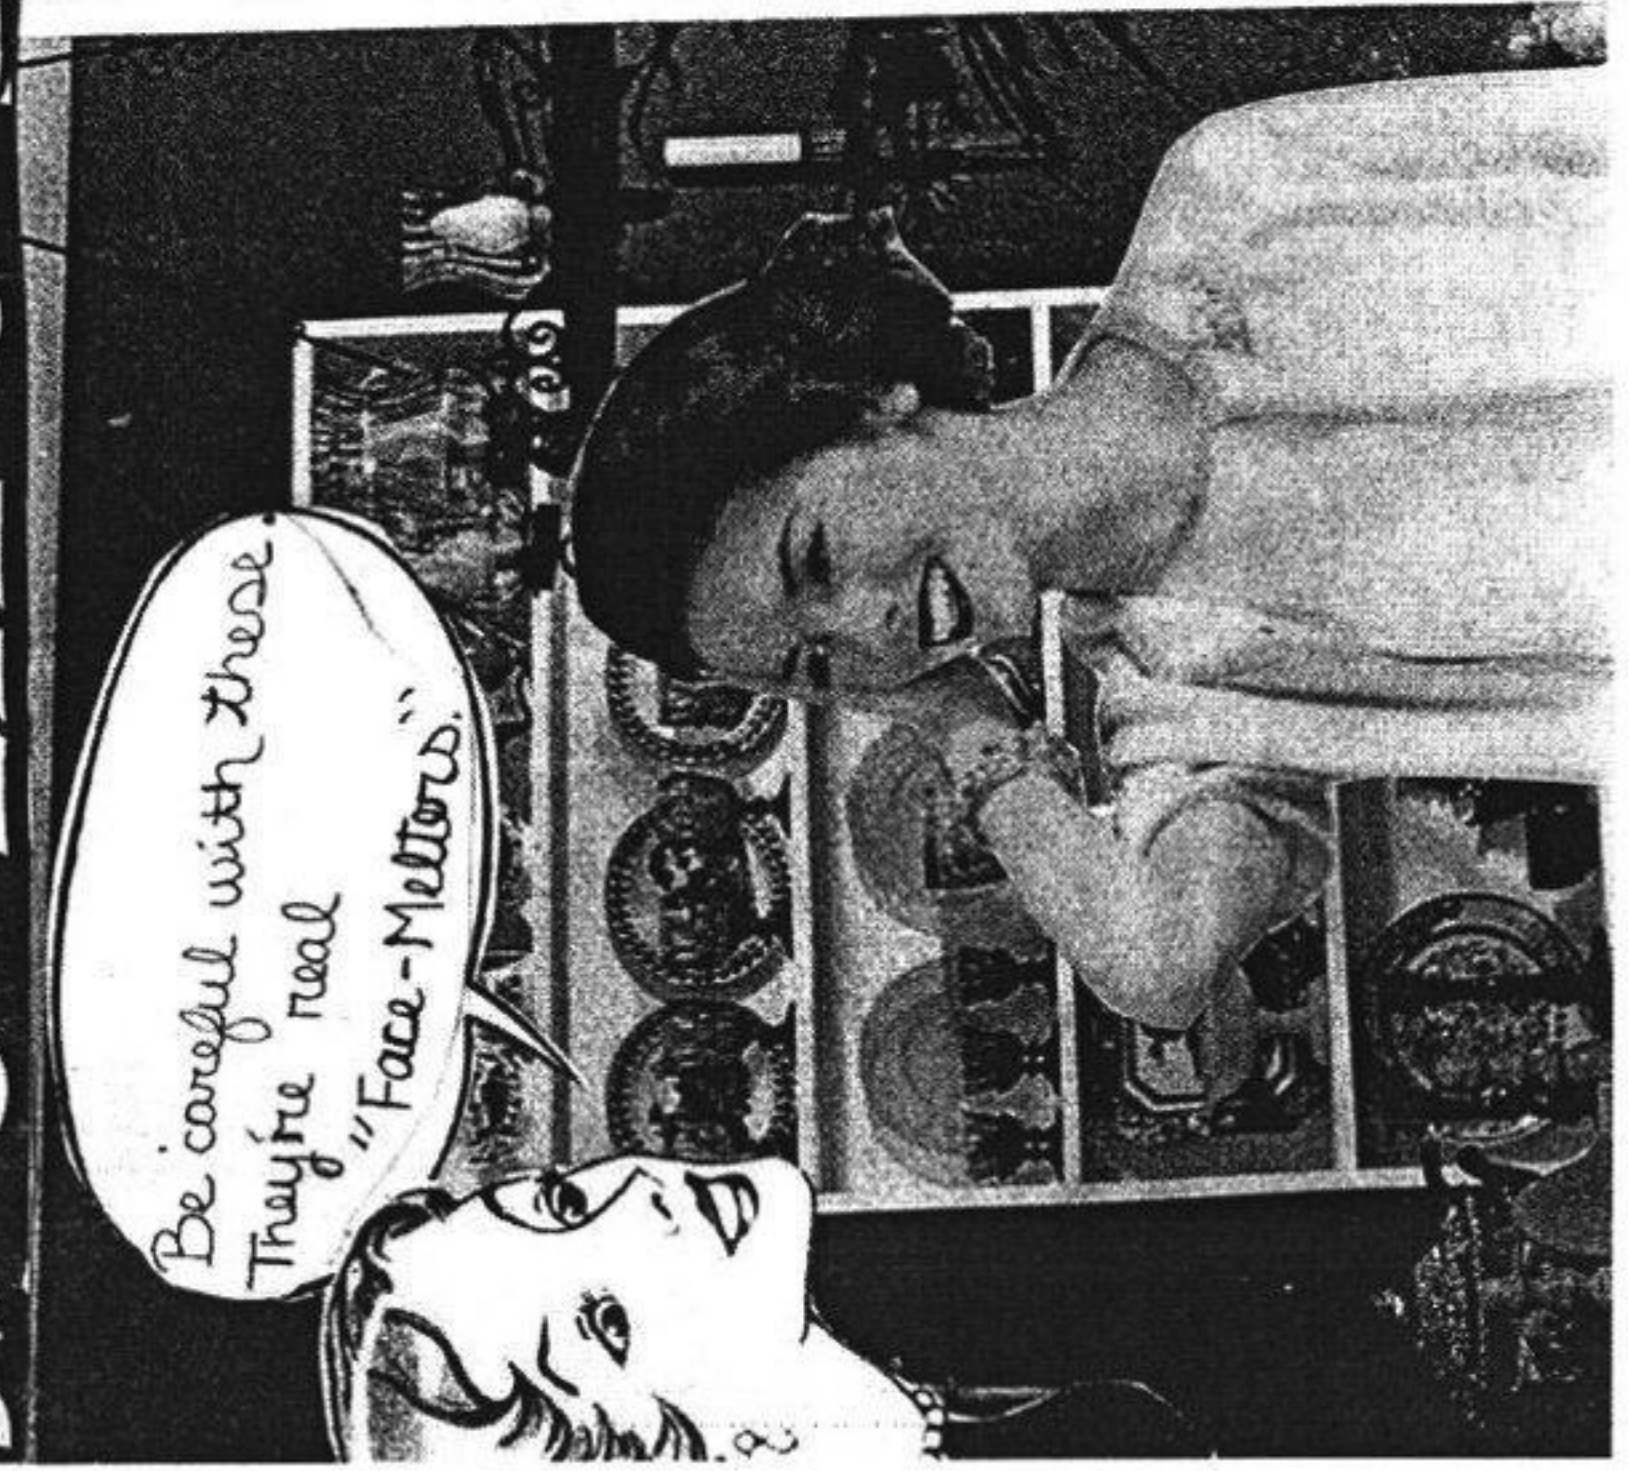

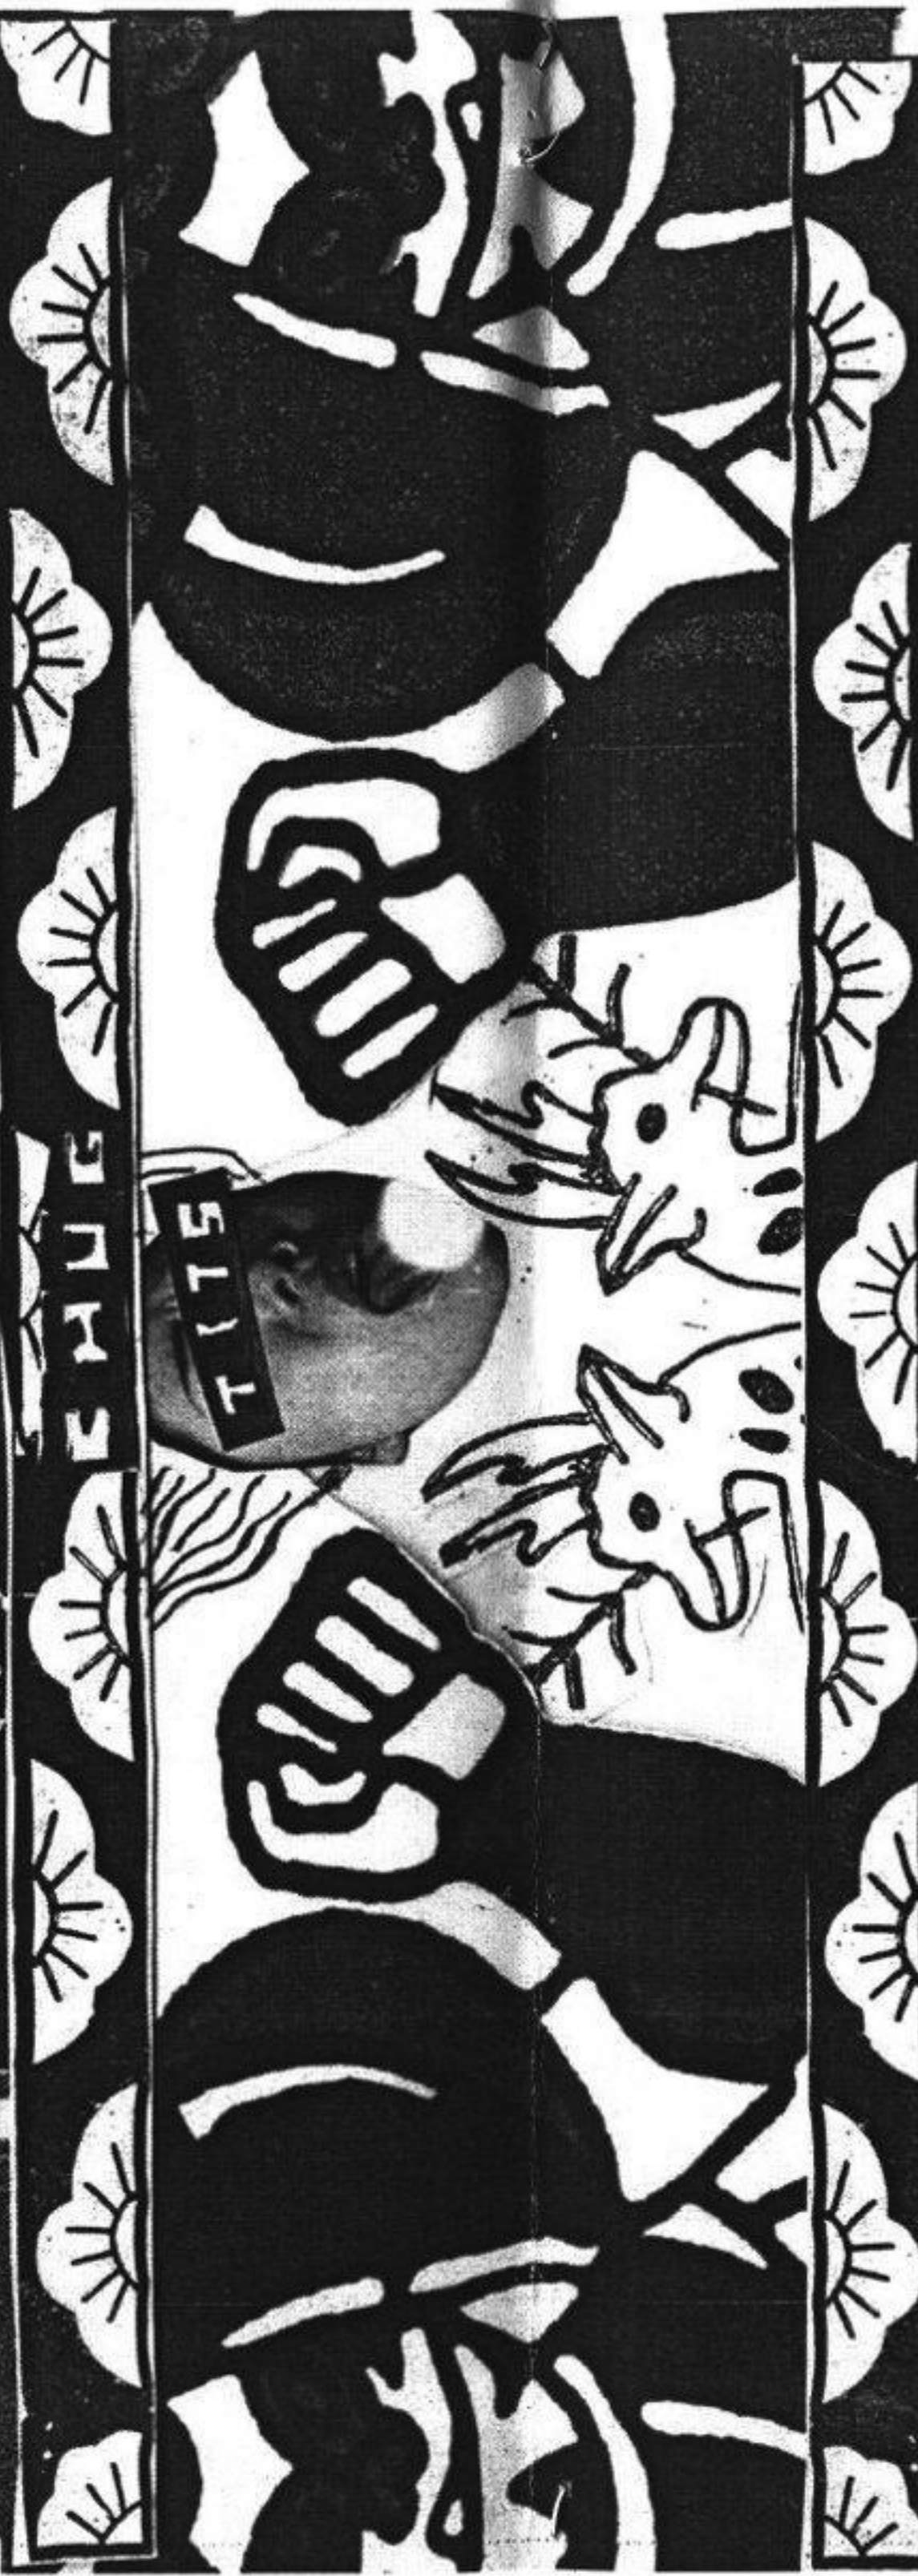

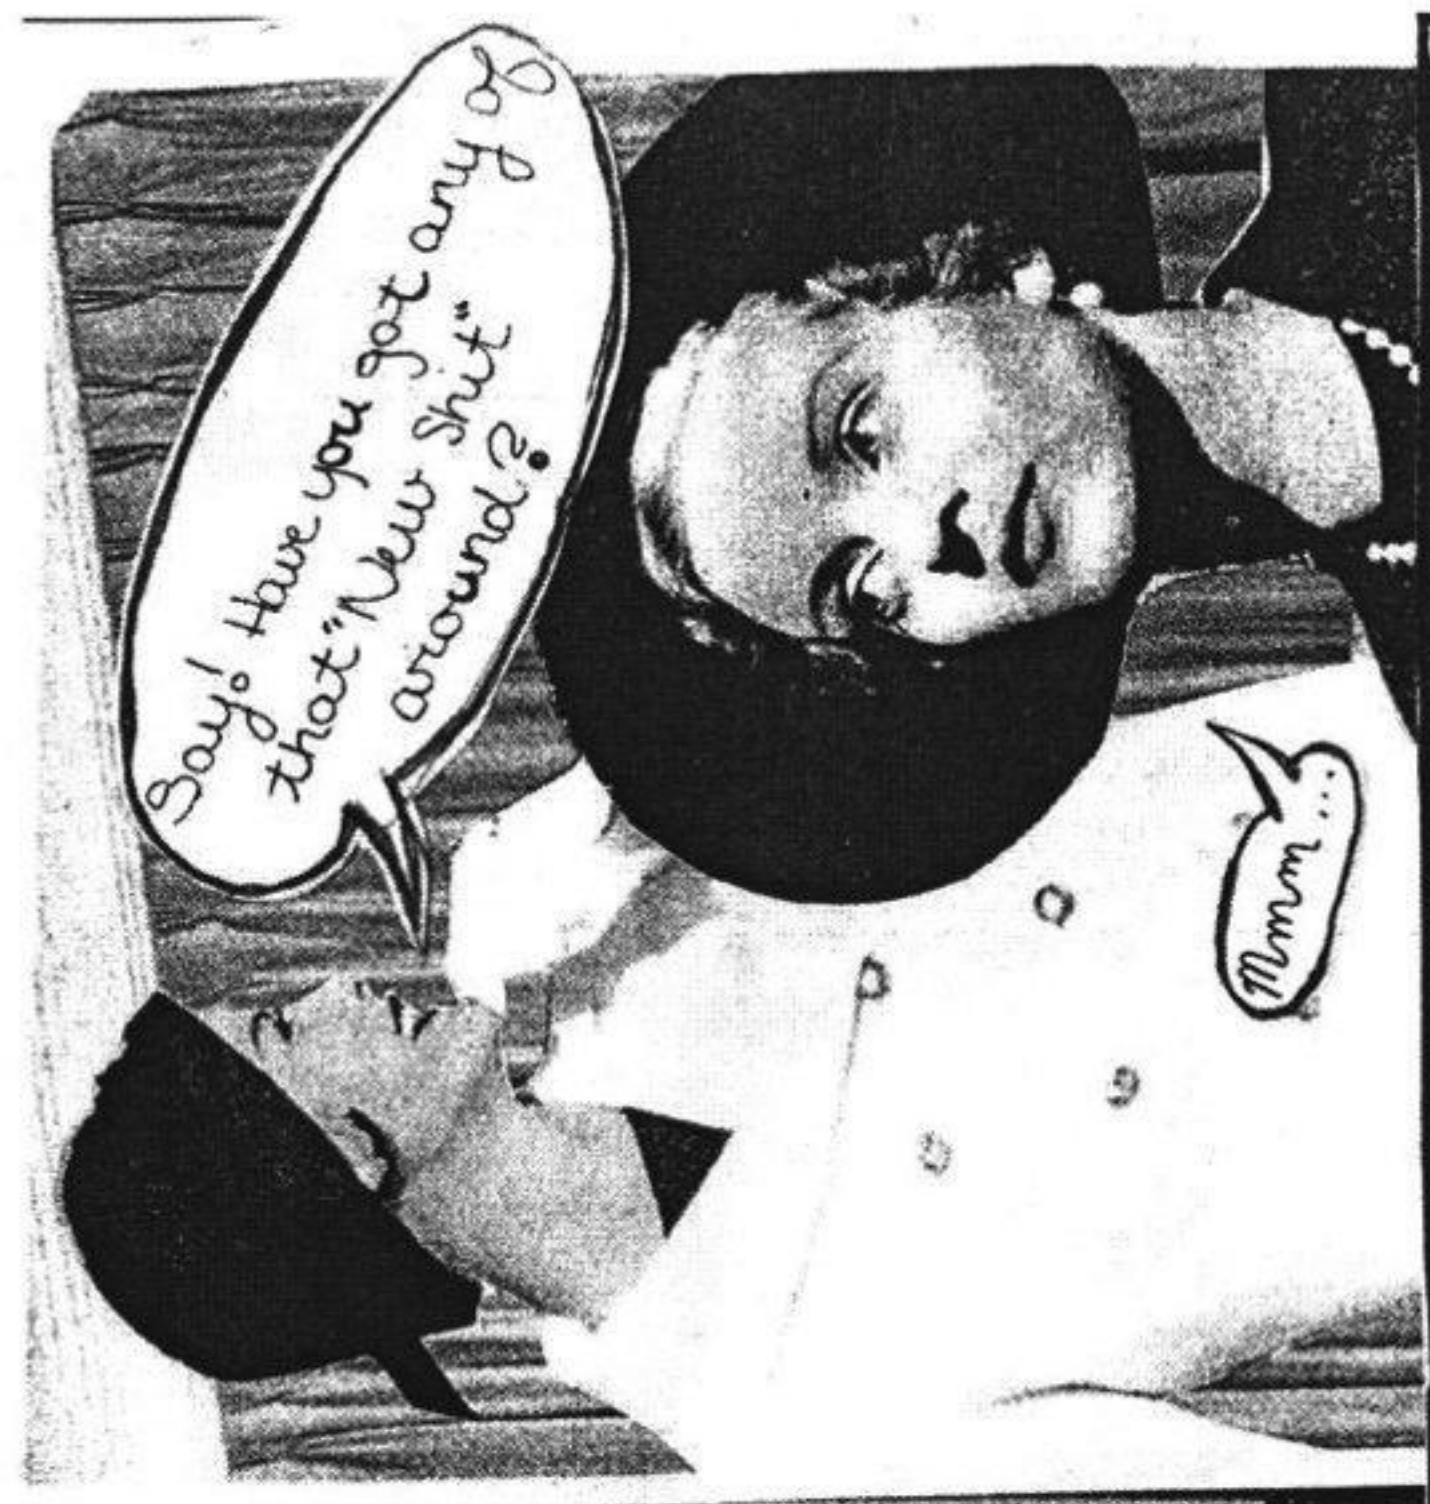

Not even Mr. Crawley. "I shall blame myself," she said, "it was my fault for being out so late. I had called on Kerrith for the afternoon and stayed there late. I was in London and not expected back until much later. Why I did not come back. When I came in, about half-past nine, she had just before seven, had her dinner, and then went down to the beach of course. I felt worried then. It was because of the accident. I would have answered me 'And we were done up in the house she always did.'" she was bruised and numb from the fall. I could see the skin was stretched across the cheek. There were little patches of yellow beneath the skin. "Mrs. de Winter had been dining with Mr. de Winter at his house," he went on. "I don't know what time he came home. It was after midnight. But it began to blow quite hard, just as he had come back. I went downstairs, but there was no one there. He came upstairs again and knocked on the door. I answered at once, 'Who is it, what do you want?' He said, 'I am about Mrs. de Winter not being here. I came and opened the door in his dining-room at the cottage I expect,' he said. 'I want to come back here to sleep if it is all right. I do not like to disturb him. After the accident had sailed in every sort of weather, but just wanted the night. I said good night to Mr. de Winter. I kept wondering though. I kept wondering. I did not want to hear of the room.
